Abstract:

Ninety days sounds like plenty of time—until you map out the medical screenings, training certifications, equipment checks, and administrative requirements that stand between your unit and mission ready.

Commanders live this. So do the servicemembers managing their own readiness while balancing family obligations, career milestones, and the reality that deployment prep doesn't pause for life.

This session shows what changes when those systems finally work together—surfacing gaps before they become delays, building training plans in minutes, and moving servicemembers through their tasks without the back-and-forth.

You'll see a live deployment scenario unfold across commanders, operations leads, and individual servicemembers. Real workflows. Real decisions. Real readiness.

This is what force readiness looks like when the data is connected and the work actually finishes.
